

The moss year – 2010

Two mosses were reported new to Britain in 2010. Ephemerella readeri resembles Aphanorrhagma patens, but has a longer seta and therefore exerted capsules, and the nerve extends only halfway up the leaf. It was collected at Lindley Wood Reservoir in Yorkshire in 2006 by E.J. Hooper, and is new not only to Britain but also to Europe (Hooper et al., 2009). In Scotland, Nick Hodgetts solved the identity of a distinctive Schistidium from the Shetland Isles that has proved to be S. maritimum subsp. piliferum (Hodgetts, 2010). It turns out to be the same as the Shetland plants previously reported as S. frigidum. With further study this subspecies may well prove to be an independent species. Its occurrence in Shetland is consistent with its European distribution; it is a northern species, widespread in Scandinavia.

2010 was another good year for epiphytes. Outstanding is Sam Bosanquet's discovery of Daltonia splachnoides in eastern Ireland and Wales. Like Colura, Daltonia has benefited from the humidity and shelter provided by conifer plantations, and it has been found increasingly in this habitat in Ireland. It has always been very rare and elusive on the British side of the Irish sea, known only from a few places in western Scotland. The Welsh locality is a big extension of its range, and doubtless it originated from spores blown across the sea from Ireland. Bryologists should look for it in conifer forests in other parts of western Britain, but with its need for greater humidity it is perhaps unlikely to spread as widely as Colura.

In contrast to this western species, other epiphytes probably arrive in Britain from spores blown across the North Sea. Chris Tipper has made several exciting finds to the north of London, notably Ulota coarctata, Orthotrichum pumilum s.l., and O. consimile, the latter at its third modern British locality. The specimen of O. pumilum matches the form known as O. schimperi, which is often regarded as a distinct species. O. pumilum agg. is a common species in continental Europe, O. schimperi being particularly characteristic of Mediterranean regions. The Atlantic climate in Britain does not suit it so well, but it may become more common now that pollution is less of a barrier to it in southern and eastern areas. Another new record of Ulota coarctata was made on Skye by Nick Hodgetts; this record is more in keeping with the historic distribution of this species in Britain.

The spread of epiphytes in formerly polluted areas is well illustrated by Colin Wall's record of Antitrichia curtispindula from Brockadale in South-west Yorkshire. This locality at one time experienced severe pollution from the Yorkshire coalfield. Almost as surprising is Sam Bosanquet's record of the same species on an exotic tree (Paulownia) within the grounds of Bristol Zoo. Antitrichia was once thought to have suffered from pollution even in remote regions such as Dartmoor, so the recent records from populated areas of the country could not easily have been anticipated.

A few years ago, Richard Fisk (2005) found Pterigynandrum filiforme growing as an epiphyte in East Anglia, far removed from its previously known British sites. Robin Stevenson has now found it on an apple tree near Wisbech, Cambridgeshire. Although P. filiforme is primarily a boreal-montane moss in Europe, it also occurs in the Netherlands, and this is likely to be another example of a species colonizing eastern England from propagules originating in continental Europe.

It is not only epiphytes that have turned up in unexpected places. There have been two new English records of Ptilium crista-castrensis in the year, following the 2009 record in Lincolnshire. Richard Lansdown found it in the Forest of Dean in Gloucestershire, and Joan Egan, Rita Holmes and Harry Lake found it by Ladybower Reservoir in the Peak District. Ptilium is very much a plant of the north and the mountains in Britain and Ireland. The two new records are associated with conifer plantations, and it is tempting to suppose that it was introduced at these sites through forestry operations. However, it is equally possible that these populations have arrived naturally, perhaps via wind-borne spores. The lowland site in Lincolnshire is in wet Salix woodland and is surely natural.

The year produced two species new to Ireland. Jeff Duckett found that Syntrichia virescens was widespread on pavements in parts of Dublin, very much in line with its occurrences in similar habitats in Britain. In such habitats it is often very small in stature and easily overlooked. Ephemerum recurvifolium is also easily overlooked. Sam Bosanquet detected it by a lane in Co. Wicklow in a habitat similar to those in England and Wales. The presence of these species is no great surprise in Ireland, but demonstrates that scrutiny of ordinary habitats can be very rewarding.

Sphagnum skyense, an impressive species, morphologically intermediate between S. quinquefarium and S. subnitens, was known for a long time only from its originally locality on Skye. It was found to be widespread on Rum in 2004, but was not collected in Ireland until 2007. Nick Hodgetts has now found it at a second Irish site in Co. Mayo. Though not surprising geographically, this record is a reminder that S. skyense remains little known in the oceanic regions where it might be expected to occur. Two other good records of Irish sphagna are Jo Denyer's new localities for S. pulchrum in Co.s Mayo and Sligo.

In Scotland, Tayloria lingulata was found by Sam Bosanquet in the celebrated Ailnack Gorge near Tomintoul. Although this was within the existing range of this nationally rare species, the habitat in rock crevices by the river was unusual. T. lingulata is normally found in montane flushes. Any new site for Habrodon perpusillus is welcome, given its disappearance from so many of its historic sites, but Chris Preston's record from Marnoch in north-east Scotland is more than just a new site; it is a substantial northwards extension of the range of this species in Britain.

The range of Grimmia muehlenbeckii continues to expand. Ron Porley has detected it new to Wales from a specimen collected by C.H. Binstead in 1924 at Cwm Idwal and originally named G. robusta, and Sam Bosanquet has collected it from a fourth Irish vice-county in Cork.

Ditrichum plumbicola has always been rare in England, known from the Mendips and isolated sites in Cornwall and Northumberland. It was surprising that it had never been recorded on the old lead mines in other parts of northern England. That has now been remedied by Jeff Duckett and Silvia Pressel, who found it in Swaledale in Yorkshire and below Helvellyn in the Lake District. It might be expected from other sites in the Yorkshire Dales, but is unlikely to be plentiful. It was very sparse at its Swaledale site.

It was feared that Dialytrichia saxicola, only recently reported from Britain, was restricted to just a single extant locality in Berkshire. The fears have proved to be unfounded. Pete Martin has collected it at Cirencester, and Richard Lansdown found it to be plentiful on both sides of the River Thames at Laleham. New localities can be expected, especially along the Thames. Another interesting English record, albeit of an introduced species, is David Holyoak's discovery of Tortula amplexa in Nottinghamshire. Though known in Britain for nearly 40 years now, it has been slow to expand its range. It seems unlikely to become a troublesome invader!
